Lack of sleep, body clock disruption can lead to diabetes

CU 11/5)—A new study by the University of Colorado shows that the longer people are awake during the time their biological clock is telling them to sleep the worse their sensitivity to insulin, which is a precursor to diabetes.

The study showed that a disruption, or circadian misalignment of a person's internal clock induced by five-hour "short-sleep" schedules, resulted in morning wakefulness during the biological night when melatonin levels were still high, said CU-Boulder Professor Kenneth Wright, lead study author. Melatonin is a sleep-promoting hormone produced naturally by the pineal gland and controlled by the brain's master clock, while insulin, produced in the pancreas, regulates blood sugar.

"We found the longer you are awake during the biological night, the worse your insulin sensitivity is," said Wright, who directs CU-Boulder's Sleep and Chronobiology Laboratory. "This is important because impaired insulin sensitivity can lead to both pre-diabetes and type 2 diabetes."

While the study participants all ate healthy diets during several days and nights of baseline measurements, they were allowed to eat the types and amounts of foods they wanted during the short-night sleep testing periods in order for the researchers to better understand insulin changes, said Wright.

"We found the body is not prepared for food intake during the biological night, nor is it prepared to be physically active," said Wright. A paper on the subject was published online Nov. 5 in the journal Current Biology.

The team tested two groups of eight healthy men and women in their early 20s, all of whom were given both oral and intravenous tests in which they drank or were infused with a sugary liquid, after which their baseline insulin levels were tested. Insulin helps fat and muscle cells absorb glucose from the bloodstream, lowering blood-sugar levels. Impaired insulin sensitivity occurs when those cells cannot easily absorb glucose, causing the pancreas to produce more insulin.

During the sleep disruption part of the study one group had just five hours of available sleep time each night for five days — simulating a workweek with too little sleep — before transitioning into five days with nine hours of available sleep time.

CSU-Pueblo seniors seek technology-based projects for spring class

CSU-Pblo 11/4) – Seniors in a computer information systems class at Colorado State University-Pueblo are seeking significant technology-based projects that will challenge the students to use most, if not all, of the skills and knowledge they have gained during the course of their education.

The CIS 432 Senior Professional Project class for Spring 2016 seeks 9-10 projects to be completed in the course of the Spring 2016 semester. Students will work in small teams to identify the specific operational issues the organization has, and to define the solution requirements their client has for addressing the issues identified.

Once this is accomplished, the team then designs a workable solution, creates it, and implements it to the client's satisfaction.

In order for the students to have a complete learning experience, the project should be fairly substantial, requiring a full semester to complete. Organizations with the need for a technology-based solution should contact Rick Huff with a brief description of the project and why it is needed.

The class is particularly interested in identifying significant projects related to IS/IT and/or organizational security and/or protection of client data and confidential information. Faculty in the Computer Information Systems department of the Hasan School of Business will screen the projects and make decisions about their inclusion in the class by the end of the semester.

Examples of recent projects include:

An update of the statewide Learning Management System for the Colorado Governor's Office of Information Technology (2015)

A replacement interactive touch-screen organizational information system for the YMCA of Pueblo (2015)

A complete overhaul and update of their archival management system for the Pueblo City-County Library District (2015)

A new electronic device inventory management system for Sangre de Cristo Hospice & Palliative Care (2015)

Pueblo Community Soup Kitchen (2105): A system to track donors, donations, and volunteers.

A system to audit and manage software licenses for Pueblo County (2014)

Pueblo Weisbrod Aircraft Museum (2014): Significantly expand the content and user-interactivity of their website.

A production control system for C&O Window & Door (2013)

A system for businesses to report on-the-job injuries for OSHA compliance for Jerry Purswell, Professional Engineers (2013)

Parkview Medical Center (2012): Rebuild and update the corporate intranet.

An online tickets sales system for the Pueblo Symphony (2012)

Website redesigns and upgrades for the Rocky Mountain Eye Center, Inc., of Pueblo (2011) and PEDCO (2010)

Project Proposals will be accepted through December 4 via email at rick.huff@csupueblo.edu.

Lack of sleep—

The other group did the opposite, starting with nine hours of available sleep time for the first five nights, then switching to just five hours per night for the next five nights.

The team found that the simulated five-day workweek of five hours of sleep per night resulted in a 20 percent reduced oral and intravenous insulin sensitivity in otherwise healthy people. It took three consecutive nights of nine hours of available sleep time to restore oral insulin sensitivity in test subjects, Wright said.

“Our study and other previous studies have shown sleep loss reduces sensitivity to insulin.
